

Ninepoint Enhanced Equity Strategy

August 2018 Commentary

August was a strange month for global financial markets as currencies, credit and pretty much every equity market outside the United States reflected growing concern over rising instability in emerging markets. Both Turkey and Argentina devolved into full blown crises last month with short term financing rates exploding to 20% and 60% respectively. Turkey continues to insist that it can dictate its own monetary and fiscal policies while also keeping its currency stable. Regardless of whether they believe this or not, the Turkish Lira has plummeted over 50% and will continue to drop until Turkey's economy adjusts (most likely by a collapse in growth). Argentina is now broken (again) and is begging for IMF help. Equity markets in China are in bear market territory and currencies and equity markets in India, the Philippines, Indonesia, Russia and Brazil are not far behind.

Despite anxiety elsewhere, U.S. equity markets (S&P 500 Total Return) continued their run from July, climbing 3% in August to close the month near an all-time high. Market breadth has remained limited, with a relatively small segment of the market accounting for the lion's share of the year's gains. A market joke has been that "the rule of 10" is in play whereby growth stocks trading at a multiple of 10 or more times sales mostly go higher while value stocks trading at 10 or less times earnings largely go nowhere or down. The lack of confirmation from credit markets has also been puzzling. Credit spreads for Investment Grade (IG) bonds were at their best levels when the U.S. equity market peaked back in January and then widened out as the equity market sold off in March. Since then however, equity markets have rallied back to their highs while IG bond spreads have yet to recover even half of their widened spreads. Maybe equity markets are right and credit markets are slow to catch up but we think it more likely that markets are simply paying more attention to global instability while U.S. equity markets remain entirely focused on the growth picture at home.

Closer to home, the TSX lost roughly 1% in August while crude oil prices climbed sharply with WTI up over 3% from July and Brent crude up over 4%. Despite the continued strong performance of crude oil prices, stocks of oil producers and service companies continue to lag substantially. Crude oil prices are up roughly 20% so far this year, yet energy stocks have barely budged (the XEG energy producers ETF is up less than 3% YTD). With inventories shrinking, supply growth well below that of demand, and the U.S. government set to enact further sanctions on Iran later this year, we continue to believe the fundamentals supporting higher crude oil prices remain in place. Our portfolio is well positioned to benefit from improving sentiment toward energy as this thesis plays out.

Although the market remains challenging for fundamentally oriented investors focused on absolute value and risk/reward tradeoffs like ourselves, we know we are not overpaying for the future cash flow stream of our companies and that our overall portfolio construction using market hedging instruments will drive attractive risk/reward payouts over time. The good news is that our hedging costs have remained below normal year to date, as more active trading has been able to take
