One of the biggest overhangs facing the market this year, the US potentially breaching its debt ceiling covenant and triggering default, has come to a successful resolution. Unlike the 2011 debt ceiling crisis, where stocks dropped almost 20% during the contentious negotiations, both political parties were able to make enough concessions to agree to a deal. Although neither side may be completely satisfied, tense negotiations resulted in the suspension of the $31.4 trillion debt limit through January 1, 2025 (also ensuring the issue doesn't flare up again during the 2024 Presidential election). Details include capping defense spending, rescinding some Covid-19 relief funds, cutting some of the previously expanded IRS budget and restarting student loan payments while maintaining the Inflation Reduction Act's funding for climate and clean energy investment. To be honest, the outcome couldn't have been any better than what was achieved but we do believe that the US political system needs to separate negotiations over the debt limit (and potentially defaulting on its prior obligations) from the political debate surrounding future spending.

After everything that investors have had to deal with since the start of the year (never mind the past three years), including one of the fastest Fed tightening cycles in over forty years, a banking crisis culminating in the failure of several major regional banks, the debt ceiling negotiations, the ongoing debate over forward earnings expectations and the continuous struggle to correctly value those future earnings streams, investors have found a new theme to chase. Unlike the "metaverse", artificial intelligence is a significant development that will likely result in tangible benefits in terms of productivity in the coming years. Admittedly, some jobs will be eliminated, but many other types of jobs will be created, and technology will become even more integrated into our daily lives. Clearly, investors are optimistic regarding the future of Al and Al-related companies, with huge rallies in semiconductor manufacturers, wafer fab equipment manufacturers and the software companies that are the most likely to benefit from artificial intelligence and the use of machine learning algorithms.

From our perspective, as dividend and real asset focused investors, this nascent investment theme has made our lives quite difficult (at least in the short term and on a relative basis). Much like in the late 1990s, investors seem willing to price in years of future growth immediately while ignoring almost all other asset classes irrespective of their merits. We can illustrate this point by looking at the year-to-date sector-specific performance of the S&P 500. The impressive gains have been led by the Information Technology, Communication and Consumer Discretionary sectors and powered by about seven stocks: NVIDIA, Meta Platforms, Tesla, Amazon, Alphabet, Apple, and Microsoft. Unfortunately, the sectors with solid dividend payouts are mostly down year-to-date, including the Energy, Utilities, Health Care, Financials and Consumer Staples sectors. But having seen the late 1990s to early 2000s tech bubble and burst, we are committed to our investment philosophy over the long term.

Unfortunately, investors still need to contend with the lagged impact of tighter monetary policy, as we work through the final stages of the economic cycle. Thankfully, inflation looks to have peaked in June 2022 at 9.1%, and has steadily trended lower ever since, but unemployment rates are now finally beginning to tick up (to 3.7% in May from 3.4% in April). Because the current midpoint of the range of the Fed funds rate is above the most recent CPI report, we believe that the tightening cycle is finally complete. Signs of credit stress further support the case for an end to rate hikes and we remain concerned about the impact of more stringent regulations and tighter lending standards on future economic growth. Essentially, we believe that inflation readings would have to reaccelerate dramatically before any additional rate hikes and economic growth would have to decline significantly before any pivot to easier monetary policy. We believe that a pause would allow some of the lagging sectors to participate in the year-to-date equity rally however investors need to be careful about being whipsawed during what could be a volatile but still rangebound market over the balance of 2023.

In an environment of moderating inflation but slowing growth through 2023, the most important drivers of investment performance will likely be valuation, balance sheet strength and the ability to consistently generate cash flow and earnings. As the speculative anything-Al-related rally burns itself out, a greater component of total returns will likely come from dividend yields, which suggests better relative performance from our strategies going forward. In keeping with our mandates, we are concentrating our efforts on free cash flow positive, high quality, dividend growth companies and real asset investments given our positive assessment of the risk/reward outlook over the next two to three years.

Top contributors to the year-to-date performance of the Ninepoint Global Infrastructure Fund by sector included Industrials (+167 bps) and Communication (+1 bps) while top detractors by sector included Utilities (-225 bps), Real Estate (-142 bps) and Energy (-47 bps) on an absolute basis.

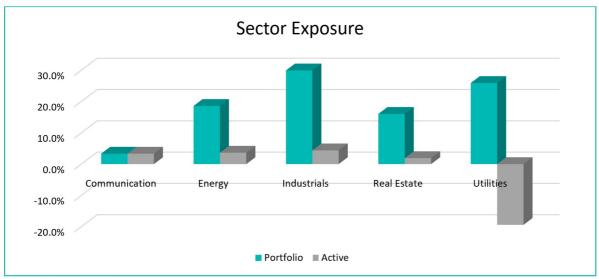

On a relative basis, positive return contributions from the Industrials (+74 bps), Real Estate (+74 bps) and Energy (+46 bps) sectors were offset by a negative contribution from only the Utilities (-179 bps) sector.

We are currently overweight the Industrials, Energy and Communication sectors, while underweight the Utilities sector. The US Federal Reserve is now likely on pause as inflation continues to trend lower, but unemployment begins to trend higher. With market returns narrowly driven by a handful of Al-related stocks in the Information Technology sector, we are cautiously waiting for participation to broaden before fully committing to the rally. As the late stages of one of the most highly anticipated downturns ever continues to play out, we remain focused on high quality, dividend payers that have demonstrated the ability to consistently generate revenue and earnings growth through the cycle.

We continue to believe that the clean energy transition will be one of the biggest investment themes for many years ahead and infrastructure stands to be a clear beneficiary. Therefore, we are comfortable having exposure to both traditional energy investments and renewable energy investments given the importance of energy sustainability and security of supply around the world.

The Ninepoint Global Infrastructure Fund was concentrated in 28 positions as at May 31, 2023 with the top 10 holdings accounting for approximately 37.2% of the fund. Over the prior fiscal year, 15 out of our 28 holdings have announced a dividend increase, with an average hike of 11.5% (median hike of 2.1%). Using a total infrastructure approach, we will continue to apply a disciplined investment process, balancing valuation, growth, and yield in an effort to generate solid risk-adjusted returns.
